In India, emergence of serious studies pertaining working class, their roles in class warfare, their contributions in Indian nationalist movements are from particularly sixties venture. Previously Rajani Palm Dutta's India Today suffered from ... "...descriptive nature containing little of analytical interest. They were concerned mainly with trade union history and chronological accounts of strikes and did not even attempt to address issues germane to the social economic and political history of labour"(1). Morris D. Morris's Emergence of the Industrial Labour Force in India (1965), although a seminal contribution in respect of analytical outlook, failed to offer a broader socio- economic perspective. Theoretical discussions about class and class consciousness in the making of the proletarian brigade; which had long tradition, now being given obituaries, has in tune with the current political situations. Attempts being made to search other avenues ie. gender, religion which are instrumental
